Digital History Initiative: Mapping American Social Movements Through the 20th Century

Submitted by Alyson Roy on March 3, 2016 - 1:20am

Mapping American Social Movements Through the 20th Century is a collaborative project which seeks to create maps and visualizations of America’s twentieth-century social movements. The project encompasses all types of social movements including radical, labor, civil rights, environmental, and women’s rights movements. By mapping all types of social movements, the project hopes to find patterns and links between different social phenomena. The project was featured on UW Today. To read the article, click on the link UW Today Article.

People Involved:
James Gregory

News Category:
In the Press  Program Innovation

Related Fields:
20th Century  American  Environment  Human Rights  Labor  Social Movements  Women

Department of History
University of Washington